Enfer détruit, ou examen raisonné du dogme de l'éternité des peines, ouvrages trad. [par le baron d'Holbach] de l'anglois. Londres [Amsterdam], 1769. (8), 160 pp. Sm. 8° G.209.70

The first part, "Essai sur le dogme de l'éternité des peines de l'autre vie," is apparently a translation of a part of "Considerations upon war, etc.," published in London in 1758; the second, "Dissertation critique sur les tourmens de l'enfer," is a translation of S. Richardson's "Of the torments of hell, etc.," which appeared in London in 1658. A copy of the latter may be found in the Phenix, vol. 2, pp. 427–475 (*4157.1.2).

Barbier and Quérard have attributed this "Dissertation" to Whitefoot, but the work of Whitefoot, upon the same subject, which may be found in Isaac Barrow's Works, 1859, vol. 9, pp. 587–607 (*3501.1.9), bears no resemblance to the above translation.

These letters, according to Barbier and Silva, have been attributed without much question to Marianna Alcaforada, and were originally published in a French translation made by Subligny (see Barbier, 3me éd., T. 5, p. 1284), who is not accepted as the translator by Sousa Botelho. This edition has the original French version accompanied by a retranslation into Portuguese by the editor, the original having never been published and thus lost. The seven letters forming the second part have been omitted. The editor examines them critically and gives cogent reasons for considering them imitations by another hand.

The title of the edition of 1527, the earliest extant, reads: La très joyeuse, plaisante et récréative histoire, composée par le loyal serviteur, des faiz, gestes [etc.] du . . . gentil seigneur de Bayart. Larousse states that this loyal serviteur was Jacques Joffrey. But Jules Roman, in the preface to the edition published at Paris in 1878 [*6634.3], shows that Jacques de Mailles must have been the author.
